

ONE

31 December, 1903, Cambridgeshire, England

Rebecca Lawrence reached a count of sixty in her head and slid her finger into the back pages of her mother's diary. Mistaking the diary for a book granted her innocence the first time she'd opened it. She had no argument for innocence now. She checked her mother remained asleep and began to read.

November 29

I deceived my brother today. He'll receive the same lie that Emily did. Whatever pity they would have given me can be shared among others this Christmas. I have enough of my own. There are mornings I wake and for a moment I am free, and then the unhappy truths of life rise up and the time that had seemed endless is taken from me. I'll not allow this disease to reduce me to misery in Rebecca's presence, although I wish I had the courage to bring this trial to an end myself; to end her suffering which I fear is greater than mine. It seems, however, I have been stripped of courage also.

Rebecca turned the page. It was blank. She heard the front door close and her father ask Elsie to bring up a pot of tea. Rebecca put the diary back on the bed and sat still, waiting. Her mother opened her eyes.

‘You haven’t moved,’ she said, smiling weakly.

Rebecca leaned forward. ‘I didn’t want to leave you. Not until Papa returned.’

‘You’ll need to leave me this evening, remember?’

‘I’d prefer to be here with you.’

‘No, you’re attending the dance, just as we agreed. Poor Tilly will be lost without you and Mrs Pugh would have already prepared your room.’

Rebecca watched her mother wince as she pushed herself up on to the pillows and felt a rush of guilt for troubling her. She glanced at the bed, suddenly doubting she had returned the diary to its correct place.

There were footsteps on the stairs. Rebecca’s mother put her diary under the quilt. She looked Rebecca in the eye and said, ‘Everyone is allowed a secret. This is mine, and now it’s also yours. Your father need not know about it. Agreed?’

The footsteps came closer. Rebecca’s father stepped into the room and smiled.

‘You’d be wise to rest a while, Rebecca,’ he said, putting down his medicine bag. ‘You’ve a long night of dancing ahead of you.’

‘She’s considering changing her mind,’ said her mother.

‘Then she will have to re-consider, won’t she?’

Rebecca looked away from her parents and stared at the firelight, searching her mind for an excuse. She wondered if snow had begun to fall. The walk into the village would be too dangerous in snow.

‘Come and sit by me for a moment.’

Rebecca did as her mother requested, perching herself on the edge of the bed. Her father sat down next to her.

‘You’ll disappoint George if you stay at home,’ he said, taking Rebecca’s hand.

‘George?’

‘Turner. I understand he’s keen to dance with you.’

Rebecca thought of George Turner's fat hands touching her waist and turned to her mother for help. Nothing in her expression gave Rebecca any hope of being excused.

'Your father and I want you to be with your friends tonight,' she said. 'We want you to forget how I am, even for a few hours. Can you try? Please, for me.'

Rebecca nodded reluctantly.

'Perhaps we'll go for a ride in the morning.'

'You really think you're strong enough?'

'Just so long as you promise to forget about me tonight, then I promise I'll attempt riding tomorrow.'

Rebecca kissed her mother on the forehead and stood up. She wanted to draw out the truth about how her aunt and uncle had been deceived. But as she opened her mouth to speak, her mother's eyes began to close.

'Be kind to George, Rebecca,' she said. 'Don't give him false hope, though. That wouldn't be fair.'

Rebecca was escorted to the dance by her father. It was his duty as parish doctor, he said, to make an appearance.

'I'll stay an hour and leave discreetly,' he said. 'I expect most folk will have drunk too much ale to notice.'

The paralysing cold had been shut out of the village hall. The fireplaces were ablaze, and though there were no chairs, there were hay bales against the walls. It seemed to Rebecca that with the exception of her mother, she was in the company of every man and woman in Welney. The piano fallboard was raised and an accordion, drum, and fiddle set in place, but the musicians were yet to begin playing. They were gathered by a cart where Tilly's mother was ladling drink into mugs. She caught Rebecca's eye and winked.

'He's here.'

Rebecca turned. Tilly smiled at her, eager and sweet.

'Who's here?'

‘Tom Guest,’ said Tilly. ‘He arrived home today. George said he plans to stay.’

‘You’ve spoken to George Turner?’

Tilly nodded. ‘Tom and he are friends. That means you have to dance with George. You will, won’t you? Please say you will or Tom will never dance with me.’

Rebecca glanced towards the cart, pretending to ignore what Tilly had said. ‘I should say hello to your mother.’

Tilly sighed. ‘If you must. But we can’t stand about too long. Tom and George are over there.’ Rebecca resisted looking away and kept walking. Mrs Pugh opened her arms and embraced her.

‘Is your mother here?’ said Mrs Pugh. ‘I’m desperate for her to try my mulled wine.’

‘Mama’s resting. She’s been a little more tired than usual today.’

Mrs Pugh touched Rebecca’s arm. ‘I’ll keep you a serving to take home. Your mother will soon have colour in her cheeks.’

‘Tom glanced at me, Mama,’ said Tilly. ‘Ever so coy he was. Should I approach him?’

Mrs Pugh frowned. She filled two mugs and passed them to Rebecca and Tilly. ‘If a man lacks the courage to approach a young lady then his character is flawed. When you wish to attract a man’s attention, pay him no attention whatsoever. Strangely, they seem to thrive on this.’

‘But what if Tom’s attention is taken by someone else?’

‘Tilly, dear, every other lady here is either years away from coming of age, or is married. Unless Tom Guest intends to anger a husband or father, there are only two ladies he can attempt to charm tonight. Rebecca, or you.’

‘Then it must be me as George is in love with Rebecca.’

Rebecca raised her eyebrows. ‘In love?’

‘Of sorts. At least, he’s talked of finding a wife. He wants to take her to America.’

‘Why would he want to leave the village for America?’
‘Excitement, fortune. I’d leave if Tom invited me.’

Mrs Pugh scoffed. ‘You most certainly would not. Your home is here in the Fens, just as Rebecca’s is.’

Tilly pulled a face. ‘Don’t say that to George, Rebecca, it might upset him. He might leave early and take Tom with him.’

The young men of the parish approached Rebecca one by one after her father departed. Whenever she was asked about her mother’s health she excused herself from the conversation or pretended she could hear nothing above the music. Midnight approached and she had danced with every man, save for George. She caught sight of him running his finger round the inside of his collar as his friends found partners to share the turn of the year with. However uncomfortable she felt at giving false hope, she could not bear to allow George’s discomfort to continue. She wove her way through the crowd and tapped his shoulder.

‘We seem to be the only ones not dancing,’ she said.

George’s eyes widened. ‘Yes, it seems that way.’

Rebecca said nothing. She braced herself for George’s request for a dance.

‘How is your mother?’

‘I adore this one,’ said Rebecca quickly. ‘Shall we?’

No sooner had George led Rebecca once round the dancing circle, the music stopped. The fiddle player stared at his pocket watch and began to count down from ten. The count reached five and George’s hands remained on Rebecca’s hips.

‘Four.’

Rebecca glanced down. George’s boots, muddied and wide, moved closer to hers.

‘Three, two, one!’

Rebecca looked up. George's lips parted.

'Happy New Year!' shouted everyone together.

Rebecca stared at George, waiting for him to find the courage to kiss her. He stared back, saying nothing. As the silence dragged, Rebecca went up on her tiptoes and kissing him on the cheek, said, 'Happy New Year, George.'

George's face lit up. 'And you, Miss Lawrence. Happy New Year.'

Rebecca woke to the familiar feeling of time pressing against her. She pulled back the quilt and got dressed. A note had been pushed under the door. It was from Mrs Pugh.

There's a tin of biscuits on the hall table. I made them extra thick for your father. Don't wait for us to appear.

Rebecca crept downstairs, picking up the tin before she left The Three Tuns by the back door. As she came round the front, a window above opened.

'Fancy your first kiss being with George,' said Tilly smiling. 'You will have to sail to America with him now.'

Rebecca frowned. 'That was not a kiss, not a real one, and I'm most definitely not sailing to America with George Turner, or anyone else for that matter.'

Tilly laughed. 'If you insist... Mrs Turner.'

'I am not marrying George Turner, Tilly Pugh.'

Tilly laughed again. 'I'm merely teasing. Anyhow, no man will take you away from Welney while I'm living here.'

'Even if you marry Tom?'

'Even when I'm married to Tom. He'll propose by the year's end, I'm convinced of it.'

'I think you're still feeling the effects of the wine.'

'Perhaps, or it could be love. You will be my bridesmaid, won't you?'